Archaeologists who follow the construction of a pipeline in the Eje Cafetero region, in central Colombia; They found an archaeological treasure containing 68 complete ceramic pieces, 1,209 stone objects and a gold nosepiece.

It was reported Thursday by the state oil company Ecopetrol. In a statement he explained that the recycled material during the construction of a section of the pipeline Salgar-Cartago-Yumbo allows to describe an occupation sequence of about 2000 years.

They were also found in a joint work with the Cenic piston conveyor, 14 tombs. Of which 8 are in "perfect condition", as well as 23,000 ceramic fragments, legrests and ceramic seals.

"With the results one could describe a sequence of occupation of several eras spanning at least 2000 years, from the 5th century BC to the 1 5th century BC Although most of the material belongs to Mirador period between 1200 and 1500 AD, "Ecopetrol explained.

The archaeological collection was given for conservation and care at the Technological University of Pereira (UTP) and will be fed by the results that will be saved until the completion of the pipeline planned for this year was completed.

According to Ecopetrol, the area's archeological intervention began in 2013 before construction work began

At the distance of 55 kilometers between the Chinchiná and Pereira municipalities, 124 sites were identified, of which 78 were excavated and included in archaeological scate

Although most of the rescue was done before the of the works during the construction and laying of the pipe, the archaeological team continues with its work.

"For this project, a plan of archaeological management was established that contemplates saving, before and during the construction of the identified sites along the new section's route", the information added. EFE
